Do you judge people by their appearance? Most people will probably say no. But let’s admit it. We all judge others, more or less, by the way they look. People learned to judge others from their past experience. Whenever we meet a stranger in the street or see someone on the subway we make certain assumptions about them. Since the only thing we know about these people is what they dress and look like, that is the only information we have in forming our first impressions of them.

Judging others by their appearance was actually a must for survival way back to the days of the caveman. When looking for a mate, a cave woman would find someone strong and athletic, who could provide her family with food and protection. Such selection was only natural from a genetic point of view, for there was a good chance that a strong caveman would father a strong cave baby.

We judge people by the way they look without knowing it. This instinct to assess others has survived evolution and we can't see a person without forming some kind of opinion about them. We can tell what kind of mood the person is in, and we can guess what type of lifestyle and interests the other person has.

Agree with it or not, fine clothes do make the man. We tend to assume that people in neat suits with well-groomed hair are successful and in control. This is the type of appearance you would want to have if you were interviewing for a job. If you went to an interview in ripped jeans, baggy pants or with a punk hairstyle you probably wouldn't get a decent job. A job interviewer would probably assume that an applicant who looked like that was going to break the rules or cause trouble at work.

Remember that you don’t have a second chance for making good first impressions. So why don’t you make the best of your appearance and use it to your advantage.

   (D) Once she found one strong caveman she would not let him go.
